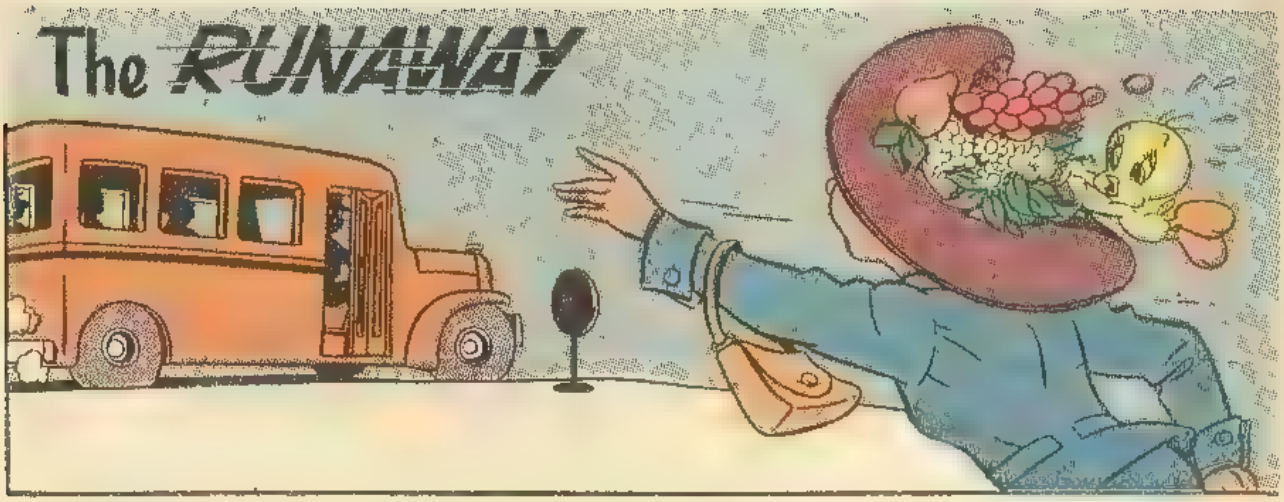
The RUNAWAY



"You'll have to stay in your cage," Tweety's mistress said one day, "so you'll be out of the way while I do my house cleaning." And she began to hum as she moved busily about the house.

Tweety sighed. He wasn't going to like this day at all! No attention and no adventure. "I'll just have to twiddle my thumbs all day long," he fretted, "unless I do something about it."

The roar of the vacuum cleaner in the next room convinced Tweety that it was time to take action. "I will run away from home," he decided, and cautiously, he unlatched his cage and scurried to an open window. Then, feeling very sorry for himself, Tweety sailed out into the world.

The first thing the little adventurer saw was a big flowered hat. Tweety's face lighted up as he soared over the hat and landed with a quiet p-l-o-p in the middle of the flowers. He was no longer alone, and he certainly was going somewhere!

Suddenly, the woman began to run. Tweety took a deep breath and held on for dear life as the hat bounced up and down! When, at last, he dared peek out from between one red rose and a bright cluster of daisies, he found that he and the lady had boarded a bus. The big machine started with a lurch that bounced Tweety high up against the lights. "Doodness!" he protested, swaying dizzily and groping for something to hang on to until he could find the woman in the flowered hat again. There she was—getting off the bus! Tweety skidded out through the folding doors behind her, just as they were about to close.

"Whew!" he gasped, settling safely among the flowers again. "Whew!"

The woman went down the street and into the back entrance of a restaurant. "I'll just put my hat in my locker and get right to work," she called out.

Before Tweety could move, he was shoved onto the top shelf of a cabinet, and the heavy steel door slammed firmly shut.

It was very dark and cold and lonely inside. Tweety shivered miserably as he huddled unhappily into a corner, trying to keep warm.

Then, he heard a lady's voice say, "I just bought it today. Wait till I show you!" And the locker door magically reopened. As the lady reached for the hat, Tweety sailed past her for freedom. "Where did he come from?" the woman gasped.

Tweety slid out of the kitchen door as fast as he could, only to fly into a shower of big cold drops of rain. His misery was complete. He longed for his cage and his mistress, even if she did ignore him!

Wet and bedraggled, Tweety found his way back home, where his mistress was just closing the windows against the rain. Hurrying, Tweety managed to slip inside and hop into his cage before she came into the front room.

"You're a dear little bird," she told him fondly. "I haven't heard as much as a peep out of you while I've been working. Come and sit in the kitchen with me while I have a cup of tea," she invited, opening his cage.

Perched in the warmth of his own kitchen, with his mistress near him, Tweety let out another big sigh — this time, a sigh of joy. It was good to be home again!
